THE LEAD PENCIL

BY WALTER H. CANDLER.

I am the pencil. I come from the balsamic hills made fragrant by the breath of kingly cedars. In my heart I carry the black carbon of Plute's world-half brother of the diamond.

I memorandum the business of a continent and strike the trial balance in the traffic of the nations. In the busy hours of the morning I note the doings of the world, while presses wait like couchant beasts to fling my word to sleeping millions.

I am a factor in the world's Great Things; millions of nervous fingers reach for me every hour.

Through me captains of New Thought lead on fast gathering hosts to make the creed of yesterday tomorrow's statue, with me the ermined seers mark out the canon that harmonizes with the basic law.

With me the pale faced scholar summons Grant and Holste and Hannibal and Genghis Kahn and makes their phantom armies shake the world once more.

I tabulate the date from the crucible of wizard men whose alchemy distill new serum to baffle death again. I trace the drunken letters of the child whose dimpled fingers first try to form the characters of the Fabled Cadmus. I sketched the song of the eager post, the wings of whose white soul beat the circus clouds to shreds. I am the Democrat, the whittled comrade of the ragged urchin, confidant of the smooth tongued diplomat, bookkeeper of the lonely sheep herder upon the mountain side.

I am the cosmopolitan, known in every mart where barter changes money, in every port where commerce spreads her sails, in every city where the brain of man doth fabricate.

THE GIRLS OF YESTERDAY

(From Judge.)

The girls of yesterday? Oh, say Where are the girls of yesterday? The girls who wore the gingham frocks,

In gardens fringed with hollyhocks; Who baked the juicy cherry pies That wafted breadth of Paradise To mere expectant man?

Will some one tell me where, I pray,

They've gone—the girls of yesterday

Are these gay matrons we behold The modest maids of days of old? These gay old girls with lobster taste,

With lips beroughed, forms tightly laced,

These peeresses of man?

Alas! their golden hair is gray— The vanished girls of yesterday; And they have left us but the theme

Of an old fashioned springlike dream Their hair is gray, but, over that, They're wearing now a golden rat— The gay old girls to-day!

FOR SALE—Seven room cottage and four lots, located on the corner of Allen and Rose Sts.
